The Centenary of the First World War in 1914

Ashingdon was right near the front line. It was in one of the southeast parts of England which would have been invaded, attacked and passed over by the enemy if Hitler had decided to follow our troops across the Channel after the Evacuation of Dunkirk. Most enemy aircraft passed over Essex and Kent on their way to attacking London, the Midlands and most UK cities, ports and airports and Ashingdon was under the flight-path and under the war in the skies.

Ashingdon was twice considered as a route and an assembly point for evacuations in the case of invasion, originally during The Great War and again during World War 2.

Residents were informed and notices were pinned up throughout southeast Essex telling people to evacuate their homes and workplaces when the alarm was raised that an invasion was imminent or in progress. The residents in the invasion zones were instructed to walk away from the coast through towns, villages and lanes via Warners Bridge, Stambridge Mill and Rochford through Ashingdon Road and Brays Lane to Ashingdon and another route via Hyde Hall Lane and Canewdon Road so that they could clear the danger areas then assemble in Ashingdon Parish until they were directed onward by the Police and Army. Their escape route would take them west or north via Hockley, Lower Road and Fambridge Road as far away as possible from the prime invasion areas of Leigh, Westcliff, Southend, Shoebury, Wakering, Canewdon and Burnham.

Ashingdon was a very secure area, so were Canewdon and the River Crouch. Nobody could get in or out of the coastal and riverside areas without passes and permission. A defensive zone closed off anywhere east of the main road south from Chelmsford to Rayleigh and Canvey or anywhere near the River Thames.

Everybody was informed and prepared for the worst but thankfully, the well arranged plans that would have taken tens of thousands of local people through Ashingdon never had to be put into operation.
